A reminder that 'Bullying affects everyone'

Bullying behaviour impacts the whole-school community. Bullying has detrimental effects on students' health, wellbeing and learning. It can make students feel lonely, unhappy and frightened. It's not just the students being bullied who are affected. Most students say they don't like seeing bullying in their school – it makes them feel worried and uncomfortable. Students who bully others are also more likely to have problems and be unhappy.

Being bullied can affect everything about a child: how they see themselves, their friends, school, and their future. Students who are bullied often experience depression, low self-esteem that may last a lifetime, shyness, loneliness, physical illnesses, and may threaten or attempt self-harm.

Some students miss school, see their marks drop or even leave school altogether because they have been bullied. Verbal and social/relational bullying can be just as harmful as physical bullying.

Students who engage in bullying also risk poor long term outcomes, including leaving school early. Some students engage in bullying for a short time only and then stop either because they realise it's wrong or they are supported to learn more appropriate behaviour.

A small group of students continue to bully others over many years. Parents, whānau and schools need to support those who bully others to learn more appropriate ways to get on with others and deal with conflict and social challenges.

Although most research in this area focuses on the impacts of bullying on initiators and targets, bullying may also have a negative impact on bystanders, those who witness bullying. Even if a child isn't being bullied, they can be affected by it. No one can do well when they feel unsafe.

Addressing bullying effectively has benefits for the future of everyone. Our goal is to provide a safe and caring climate at William Colenso College that deters any form of bullying. If you experience bullying of any kind, please talk to your form teacher or Dean immediately.

Looking forward to a great term. Take care of yourself and each other. Remember there is still time to step up and raise the bar.
